Sidomin Island

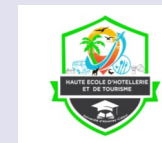

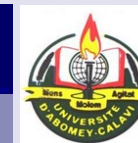

Towards the end of the 17th century, in the time of a king named Dida, two rival groups would have left Adja-Tado country almost simultaneously and would have moved, by different routes, towards the south-east, both ending up in the region. of the Lower Sô. In their expeditions, they would have discovered a mound of dry land in the Sô delta along the western arm of the river at a locality of Sindomin literally translated as "old house". So this is where the first to arrive.

In these photos, we observe respectively a Black Heron and Aigrettes gazettes. There are also wild ducks, whistling ducks, hawks, pelicans, fishing mornings are among others the species that characterize the avian fauna in Ganvié.

The floating market

It is since the historic conference of the Francophonie that this market inherited this name, that of Floating Market. This floating market called in the local language "Agbodji" comes alive every day from 4 am to noon or even 1 pm under the hot sun whose brilliant rays pierce the surface of the water; It is a market punctuated by the sale of fishing products and exchange between sellers and buyers. Here the women run their shops on their canoes forming a concentrated mass of people active in selling various items to customers who refer to them.

Lovers' street

The street of lovers is a hydraulic street, without lamppost of course, which welcomes and shelters romantic meetings.

This name was given to it because in the past, pigeons came in the evenings to coo along this street; which is a sign of love. Between 7 p.m. and 1 a.m., young people make romantic dates to see each other. The rue du grand canal is the major crossroads of the lakeside village of Ganvié.

Construction on Stilts

These building materials are admired by tourists because they do not believe that from such fragile elements, men could build sustainable homes on water.

Temples of the deities Sakpata and Dan

AHOUANTCHINKO : Located in the village of Dakomè, It is the divinity who helped Adjagninfindé in his migration from Adja-Tado; protective god therefore and of war, he remains one of the strong deities of the community; We also find TODAN and AHITONOU: snake gods, protectors of the city and provider of wealth and well-being to the populations, are also properties of the Dakomenou.
